The East Palo Alto Center for Community Media is a tax-exempt nonprofit organization that created local media outlets in East Palo Alto to provide important news and information to the community's residents. We think people who are informed about the issues, affecting their lives, are better able to build healthy communities in which they can feel connected, involved, secure and empowered. We would like to invite you to partner with the center. Your assistance will enable us to continue to deliver critical and important media services to more residents.

By donating some of your time, money and talents, you will enable the center to maintain its summer journalism training program, publish the East Palo Alto Today newspaper more often and provide employment for community residents in exciting jobs as writers, researchers, photographers, and web and video producers. Several of our interns have gone on to pursue degrees in journalism. See below how you can partner with the center and help us reach our goals.
